

MSC 1003 - Music in Civilization Fall 2017

Prof. Smey

Class 24 Notes, Tuesday Nov 28

We begin this unit by looking at the roots of African-American music in the 19th century. We discuss some musical characteristics that may have traveled over from Africa, early musical activities in the 1800s, and the emergence of Blues and Ragtime.

Our 4:10 class did this in person in Class 23, but 2:30 did not. It is all reproduced in an online unit with accompanying exercise.

In this class we'll look at our first three periods of Jazz history, the New Orleans Style, Swing, and Bebop. Remember that any name in bold type is important to study for the quiz.

1900-1930s – the emergence of Jazz and the New Orleans style

The emergence of jazz involves bands with a mixture of horns, drums, and chordal instruments such as piano, guitar, or banjo. These groups of musicians originally formed to play Blues, Ragtime, and other styles of dance music that were popular at the turn of the century. By blending these styles of music and adding a lot of improvisation these groups created jazz.

An early figure who became famous for playing jazz music was New Orleans trumpeter Buddy Bolden, who was active around 1900-1907. Unfortunately this was too early to be recorded, so we don't know exactly what his band sounded like.

After a crackdown on Storyville, the "red-light" district of New Orleans in 1917, many musicians traveled upriver to Chicago, where they recorded the first jazz records.

In class we first listened to Joe "King" Oliver's Creole Jazz Band 1923 recording "Dippermouth Blues." Louis Armstrong plays second cornet in this band. He eventually becomes one of the most famous figures in jazz history.

For the quiz we will listen to Louis Armstrong and his Hot Five with their 1927 recording of "Hotter Than That." In class we carefully followed the structure of the record, which begins with Armstrong playing the tune on trumpet and then moves through a few improvised solos. In general one could say that the structure of a jazz performance is a lot like a Theme and Variations, as the form of the main tune is repeated over and over and people add new things each time.

Characteristics of the New Orleans-style of jazz

There are a few ways that this early period of jazz sounds distinctly different from later periods.

- The beat still owes a lot to ragtime, with its somewhat stiff “oom-pah” pattern. (When modern musicians play this music it is not so stiff but it still has a noticeably different groove, more like a marching band.)
- At key points in the performance all musicians will solo at once, creating a chaotic, polyphonic texture.
- New Orleans-style jazz uses certain instruments that are less common later. The bass line may be played on a tuba. Saxophones are rare but clarinet is very common. And the banjo is a common element in the rhythm section (instead of the guitar).
- Because of the limitations of recording technology at this time drummers were not allowed to play much.

1930s – early 40s: The Swing Era

Swing introduces a few stylistic changes.

- “Everyone soloing at once” is basically abolished. Instead, performances are more organized, and horns tend to play coordinated back-up riffs.
- The groove becomes more swinging and danceable. Bass lines in particular tend to hit all four beats in a constant pulse.

This is the era of the Big Band, groups of 20 or so musicians with a full trumpet, trombone, and sax/clarinet section. Important big band leaders include...

Duke Ellington (1899-1974)

Duke Ellington is artistically the most important figure of the swing era. He began leading bands in the 20s, and by the 30s he was writing ambitious compositions that aimed for unique concepts and sounds.

Between in-class listening and homework we heard Ellington’s “Mood Indigo,” “Ko-Ko” and “Take the A Train.” The latter tune was composed by Billy Strayhorn and probably co-arranged by Strayhorn and Ellington.

Benny Goodman (1909-1986)

Benny Goodman was the most successful popularizer of jazz. His concert appearances in 1935 and 1936 became media sensations that made swing music and dancing mainstream entertainment. His most recognizable recording today is probably “Sing Sing Sing (with a Swing).” In 1937 he was also the first white musician to play with a desegregated band, which featured the pianist Teddy Wilson and vibraphonist Lionel Hampton.

Glenn Miller (1904-1944)

Glenn Miller was perhaps the most pop-oriented entertainer of the era, presenting familiar tunes such as “Moonlight Serenade” and “In the Mood.”

Count Basie (1904-1984)

During Swing's wave of popularity the Count Basie band emerged as a new alternative for jazz purists, who liked his blues-based compositions and hard-swinging beat.

(Quiz note: Ellington and Goodman are going to be important for the quiz, Miller and Basie are not.)

Bebop – mid 40s to Present

Bebop was a movement to pull jazz away from the world of popular entertainment and make a more challenging kind of "art." It has several stylistic trademarks:

- Return of small groups, often 3-5 players. It was played in bars like Minton's Playhouse on 118th St. in NYC.
- Not for dancing. The beat is more aggressive and "abstract." Drums and bass are often louder in the mix.
- There are generally no more carefully arranged backup horn riffs or fancy composed-out interludes. We go back to the Theme-and-Variations-like form that we saw in the New Orleans period – the musicians just play the tune and then take turns soloing over the structure of the tune. This music is really all about the solos.
- Solos feature long, ornate lines with lots of notes. They use "advanced" techniques like exotic scales, new chords and so on.

We have heard music from a few major figures in the bebop movement.

Dizzy Gillespie, trumpet, was an early innovator in bebop improvisation. He often teamed up with Charlie Parker (a pairing referred to as "Bird and Diz.")

Charlie Parker (aka "Bird"), alto saxophone, is probably the greatest bebop soloist of all time. He could improvise very elaborate lines with lots of notes and he made it all sound effortless.

We also heard Miles Davis playing trumpet with Charlie Parker. Davis eventually led his own bebop combo and would be hugely important in future developments in jazz.

Finally, we looked at the somewhat eccentric pianist and composer Thelonious Monk, whose tunes have a distinctive "off kilter" sound. Monk is not trying to impress by playing long, complicated lines in his solos – instead he explores punchy and unusual gestures. His compositions are always catchy and fun, and musicians still love to play them. ("Off kilter" means "out of balance" or "crooked." Students often don't know what I mean by this, but it is still my favorite way to describe Monk's musical style. He's a little strange but very fun.)

(I've also put up a bonus page on Charles Mingus, another post-bebop composer who rivals Monk in popularity and influence.)
